Quo vadis China?

Chinese equities have not exactly been among investors' favorites this year. After the sharp price declines at the beginning of the year, another setback followed in the third quarter, which is why the Hang Seng has now lost -40% in value over the year. The reasons for this are manifold, partly home-made and possibly also of a longer-term nature.

China's real estate market has become a problem child over the past few months. Starting with real estate developer China Evergrande, whose debt service delays turned out to be a structural problem and a direct result of years of rampant and leveraged growth strategy of an entire industry. Or, as seen most recently, the massive protests by affected builders who refused to pay their loan installments to their construction lenders for unfinished or suspended construction projects. The real estate market in China has now been depressed for many months and is not only weighing on the domestic economy, but also recently weakened the government's position at home.

Most recently, Xi Jinping underpinned his socialist ideology during his re-election as chairman of the Chinese Communist People's Party, thus scaring off capital market participants. Many now assume that the regulation of various sectors that began last year - starting with the country's e-commerce, Internet and education sectors - will now continue, which is likely to continue to weigh on the country's economic ambitions. Another factor of uncertainty, especially for new investments in the country, is likely to be the continuation of the government's strict zero-covid policy.

Quo vadis China?

For years, China was seen as a global growth engine with a great hunger for imports of raw materials and even greater export performance. The partly homemade problems at home, the ongoing international tensions and the continuing logistical challenges in the world - which have been exacerbated by the Russian war of aggression since the beginning of the year - have caused the Chinese growth engine to stutter and are causing uncertainty worldwide. Will the real estate crisis in China spread? How heavily will sectors in the country be regulated? Will the China-US conflict escalate further? How badly will the global economy catch a cold if China doesn't stop coughing?

In any case, stock market players do not seem to be abandoning their cautious stance toward Chinese stocks that they have held for months. On the contrary, in recent days and weeks they have once again taken a clear stance and shown increased skepticism. Courageous investors are certainly going on the one or other bargain hunt at the current rock-bottom prices, but majority of investors will keep their feet still for the time being and observe the situation from the sidelines.
